JUSTUS SCHWAB MOURNED

The disciples of extreme Socialism and Anarchism in this city were assembled in harmony yesterday to mourn the death of one of their leaders. This, it is declared, is without a precedent. The occasion was the funeral of Justus Schwab.

The Anarchists meet at 15 East Fourth Street, a gathering that was to form a catafalque at a family home in the East Side tenements. The casket was brought to the church in a dray. The funeral cortège walked in processional order to the gravesite, and the pallbearers carried the casket to the grave site, where it was lowered into the earth. Sadness and tears filled the air as the final words were spoken in memory of Justus Schwab.

Eva Goldman, the woman Anarchist leader, who had been the dead man's closest friend, was the only one present at the service. She was the only one to address the congregation and to pay tribute to her friend. She spoke of his life and his work, and of the pain that his death had brought to her.

The funeral service was held in the assembly room of the Labor Lyceum at 43 East Fourteenth Street. The body was taken from the room over the saloon at 50 First Street, where Schwab had lived, early in the day, and placed on a bier in the middle of the room. The procession consisted of the American Anarchists, who were dressed in black and who carried a white banner. The banners were wrapped around the coffin and thrown over the lower part of it, and flags which various labor unions hung below.

There was a plate of food served, which was brightened up the dark hall, arranged on a table at one end. There were wreaths from Cigar Makers, Steel Workers, and from the Italian Anarchist society, and from the Social Science Club.

Justus Schwab's soul was marked by the absence of any religious ceremony, and of speeches by various friends of the dead man. The band of the Anarchist club was present to play a dirge. At one end of the hall, the band arranged to play a dirge that seemed to harmonize with the somber surroundings, and to give evidence of the grief of the Anarchists. The band played a dirge and a waltz, and the crowd sang "Eventide." George Biederknap, the author of a book on Socialism, recited a poem dedicated to the memory of Schwab, entitled, "The Storm Has Passed," and when he had taken his seat almost every one in the room was in tears. Alexander Jonas, a Socialist leader, made a speech, in which he called on the people to remember Schwab, and to remember the principles for which he stood.

"When I attempt to speak of our dead brother, I have never known a man so self-sacrificing, so faithful, so noble." John Most, who had been the leader of the Anarchists, recited a poem, and the next speaker was the body of Schwab. The procession consisted of the American Anarchists, who were dressed in black and who carried a white banner. The banners were wrapped around the coffin and thrown over the lower part of it, and flags which various labor unions hung below.

The procession consisted of the American Anarchists, who were dressed in black and who carried a white banner. The banners were wrapped around the coffin and thrown over the lower part of it, and flags which various labor unions hung below.

The procession consisted of the American Anarchists, who were dressed in black and who carried a white banner. The banners were wrapped around the coffin and thrown over the lower part of it, and flags which various labor unions hung below.